

THEY DON'T GIVE A FUCK ABOUT YOU

For every billionaire, millions go hungry. That's what creates billionaires: the concentration of wealth in a few hands. When you hear about a billionaire running for president or a billionaire buying Twitter as you pass homeless encampments on the way to your second job, make no mistake—it's all connected.

They'll tell you anything to make you believe that your problems are your own fault, to pit you against each other, to get you to work a double shift so you can make more money for them. But however hard you work, they take home more than you do. That's the nature of capitalism.

They tell us they want to preserve free speech, that they offer us "opportunities," that they're here to protect us. Then they buy up the ways we communicate, fix the algorithms, determine what we see and hear. They sponsor fascists who attack anyone who criticizes them, spread lies to foment ethnic and religious hatred. They want money to be the only thing that has value so we can't dream of anything else.

We deserve a world in which people are respected for what they share, not what they take for themselves. The real problem is the system that creates these inequalities in the first place. Rather than competing to be the ones who exploit and oppress, let's abolish the means by which they do.
